City and Country

It seems a ghastly pity that all the girls and boys are thronging to the city, grown tired of village joys. The city bids them enter, gives them the cordial hand; and down in old Hay Center the empty buildings stand. "Aw, chee," the kids are saying, "the old town is a frost; we'll go where bands are playing, regardless of the cost." The country town is shrinking, it's known a dismal slump, with only gray-beards drinking around the village pump. The sad-eyed merchant princes gaze down the dusty street, and brushing shelf-worn quinces, invoke the name of Pete. The young folks all are leaving, they go on every train, to search for joys deceiving, and pleasures all in vain. Adventure is the mentor that counsels them to go; and down in old Hay Center the life is pretty slow. Hay Center's ways are quiet, she's calm, without, within; she has no midnight riot, or garish brands of sin. Her people all are sleeping when village clocks strike ten, and no cheap sports are keeping high wassail in a den. They go to church on Sunday to hear the pastor shout and all the dames on Monday still hang the washing out. Hay Center has no pink uns to chronicle life's game; but from such towns our Lincolns and other great men came. It's sad to see her dying, abandoned, dusty, gray; but all the kids are sighing to tread the Great White Way.
